EXPLANATORY NOTE

In many countries all over the world, there is a growing recognition of autism as a healthcare crisis and a national concern. In the United States, for instance, where one out of 59 children are born with autism, President Donald Trump has recently signed a bill that allocates $1.8 billion in funding to help Americans in the autism spectrum. The Autism Collaboration, Accountability, Research, Education and Support (CARES) Act provides funding for autism programs and research in the U.S. and includes care for the aging members of the society and expands government programs to include older people with autism who were or are often misdiagnosed, under diagnosed, and overlooked. In other parts of the globe, the autism community also receives huge support.

Sadly, in the Philippines, notwithstanding the State policy to protect and promote the rights of all persons to full, healthy and holistic development, thousands of families struggle every day with autism with very little or no support from our government. Medical experts in the field of autism have declared that given the proper guidance, attention, education, and training, persons with autism (PWAs) can be useful citizens in society. Unfortunately, people lack understanding as to how PWAs can actually live independent and productive lives. As a result, the development of PWAs is stunted and, instead of becoming productive citizens, they become burdens not only on their families, but also on the whole community. It is, therefore, urgent to address the concerns of the autism community by adopting and implementing programs to help society accept and understand PWAs.

Specifically, the State should immediately create an environment conducive to the development of PWAs so they reach their full potential and become independent, self-reliant, productive, and socially-accepted members of society. Toward that end, institutional and social mechanisms to support PWAs and empower them must be established. We need to have long-term measures to develop autism screening, early diagnosis, and intervention programs for children. Experts should be able to transfer knowledge to the community especially to parents of PWAs to enable them to create a home program for their children so they need not rely solely on therapists. We have to devise and fund a strategic plan for autism research. We need to explore and adopt strategies to address the needs of PWAs and improve the quality of life of PWAs, i.e., improve their access to education, intervention and therapy, employment, and care. In sum, just as other countries have recognized autism as a healthcare crisis, so must the Philippines.

In light of the foregoing, to promote a healthy and productive environment in the Philippines and protect the rights of PWAs to full, healthy and holistic development, the speedy approval of this Bill is earnestly recommended.
