EXPLANATORY NOTE

The right of employees to security of tenure is enshrined in our Constitution, and yet increased competition in the globalized marketplace means that this right has frequently been subordinated to the needs of employers for a flexible labor force. This has given rise to the phenomenon of contractualization or casualization, to an increase in what some countries refer to as precarious employment. The difficulty lies in the fact that under such schemes, it is possible that persons who do the same kind and amount of work as regular employees, persons who are essential to the business of the employer, are nevertheless denied the status and attendant benefits of a regular employee, often through the imposition of fixed term contracts, or through the abuse of the probationary mechanism of employment

While it is reasonable that industries under distressed conditions should be allowed to engage in flexible labor practices, it is important that, consistent with the mandate of the Constitution, these instances be the exceptions, and regular employment must be - in practice as well as on paper - the general rule. The necessity of regular employment - one that allows for upward mobility as a reward for excellence and diligence - to the Filipino family cannot be overemphasized, for it is almost impossible to have a stable family, or even to plan for the future, if one does not have a stable job.

The fact that contractualization has remained a concern for employees for more than a decade shows that the current legal framework is inadequate at dealing with the issue. Abuses occur in the current system because some unscrupulous employers can take advantage of grey areas in the law in order to circumvent the right of employees to security of tenure, for no other reason than to enhance the profits of an already profitable enterprise. This bill creates a new category of employment, one that returns regular employment to its primary position, while making allowances for distressed industries. It makes clear and precise distinctions and corrects legal loopholes, and ensures that the nation's legal framework will once again support the right to security of tenure, rather than undermine it. While labor legislation always involves a balance of interests and the sacrifices inherent thereto, to maintain the status quo is to ignore the plight of those most in need of the protection of the law.

I urge my fellow lawmakers to address the problem of contractualization and I earnestly seek the approval of this bill.
