EXPLANATORY NOTE

In a general sense, a gift certificate, check or card is, for all intents and purposes, good as cash. It is purchased with money and money having no expiry date, it follows that in the case of a gift certificate, check or card, the same must bear no expiry date at all.

It makes no good business sense for suppliers of gift certificate, check or card to place an expiry date over what amounts to cash per se. If the reason is the risk of such certificates, checks or cards being issued as susceptible to tampering, then, it is well within their responsibility to make sure this will not happen through modern security methods.

It is a well-acceptable view that since such certificate, check or card is bought with money, it must also be redeemable until used up by the holder or the owner. Money does not expire unless it is already demonetized which rarely happens. So the same must apply to a gift certificate, check or card.

While the Department of Trade and Industry has already come out with an administrative order to this effect, banning gift certificate with expiry date, it is still within the province of the Legislature as the proper lawmaking body to initiate the corresponding piece of legislation.

It is in this light that this bill is filed for its immediate approval.
